Big SPIKE and Little TYKE

DUCKY DILLYDALLY

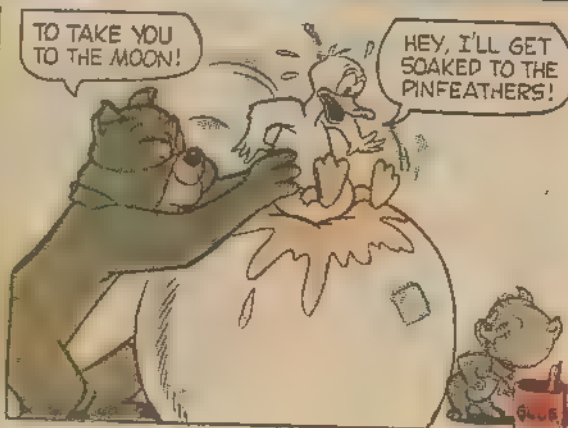

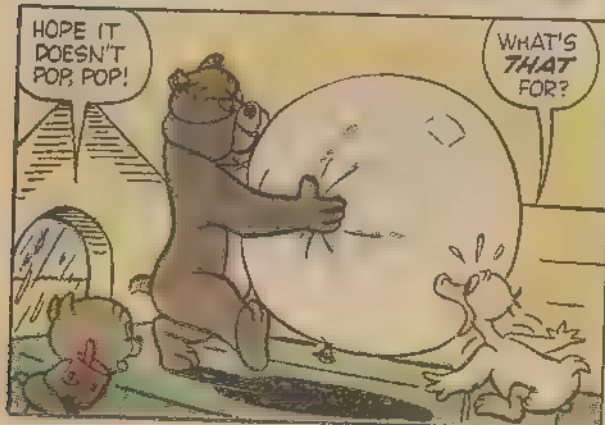

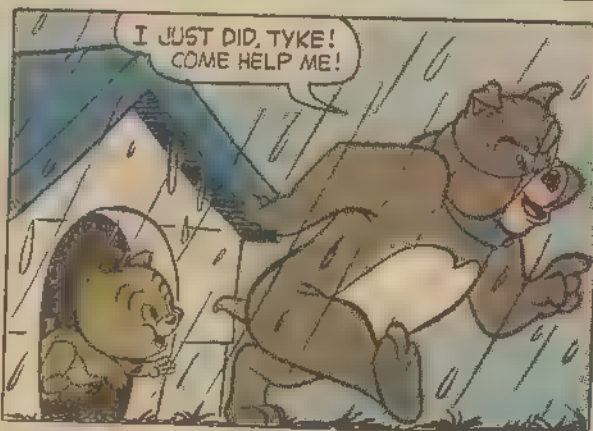

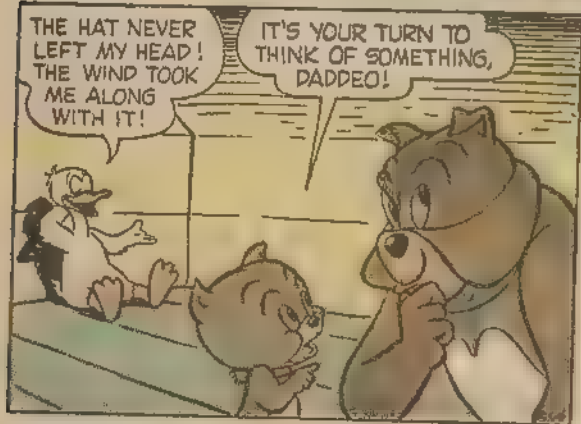

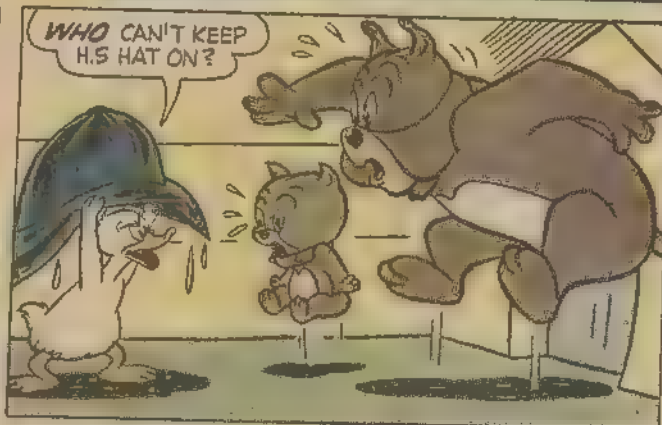

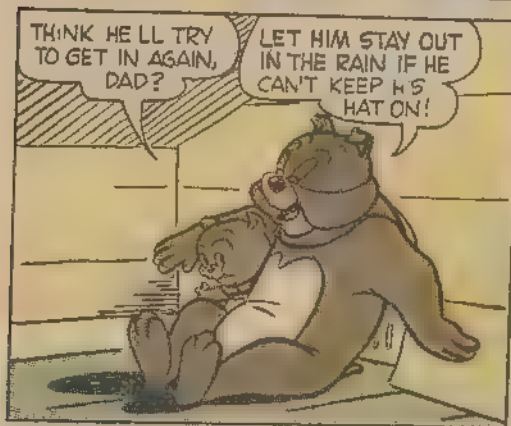

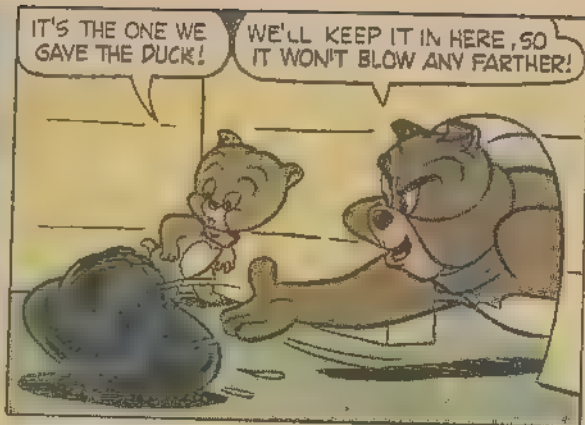

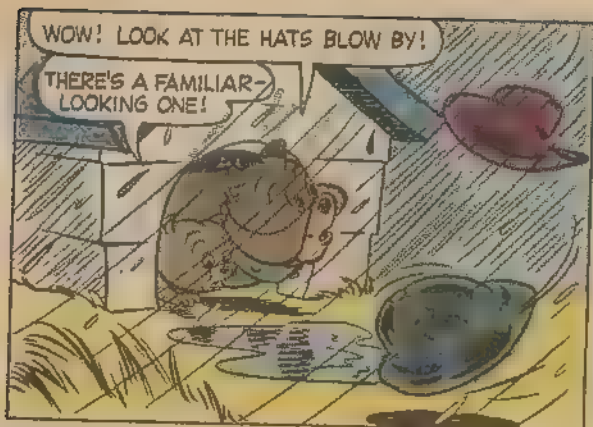

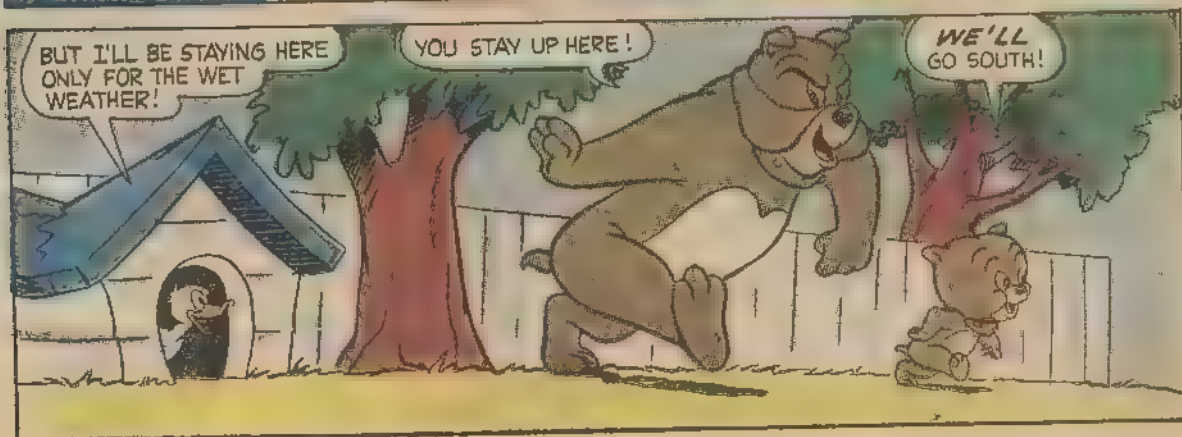

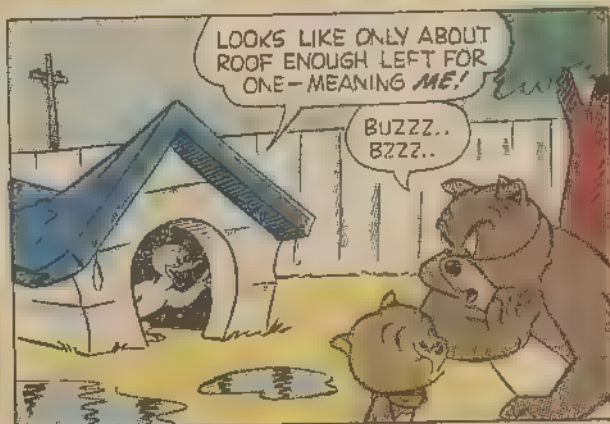

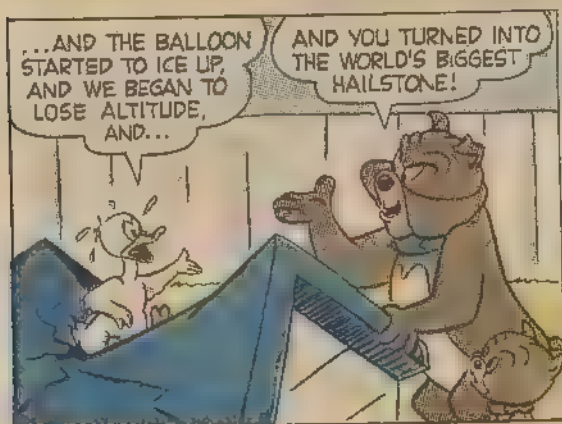

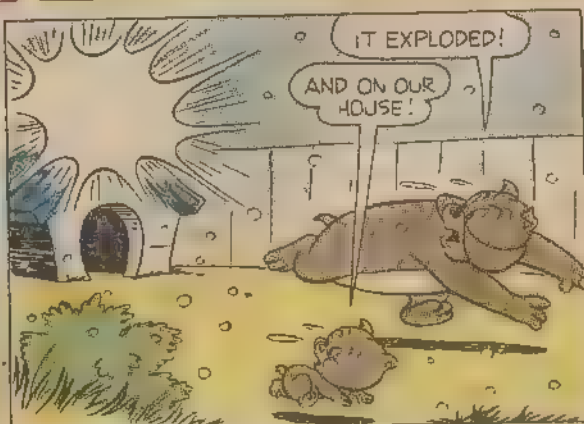

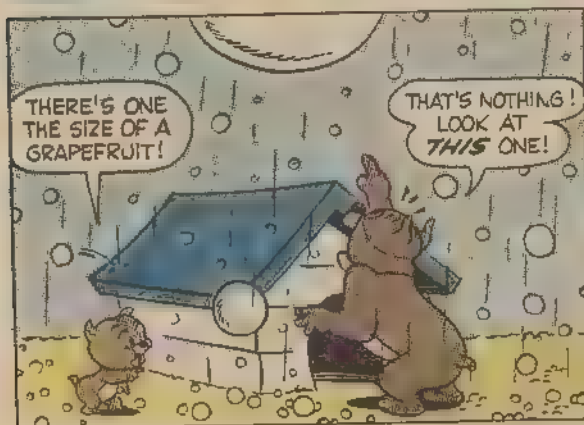

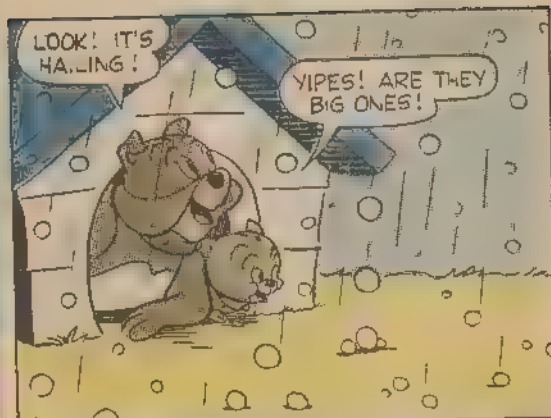

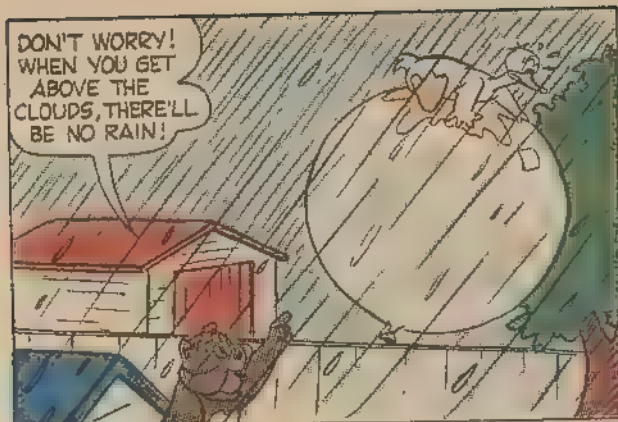

"Ya-hoo! It's snowing," cried Wuff happily as he peeked out of his house one crisp winter morning. "I think I'll run over and rustle Sammy out of bed!"

"Hello, Sammy!" Wuff called when he arrived at the tree in which his friend lived. "Put on your mittens and galoshes and come on down. Let's build a snow man!"

"Say! That's a great idea," exclaimed Sammy as he ran to join Wuff. "Look at all this snow."

"Let's make our snow man at the bottom of that hill," suggested Wuff. "Then we can build it around that old tree stump. That'll make our snow man tall and strong!"

"Good enough," Sammy agreed, heading for the hill. "Let's make a really funny-looking one."

As Wuff and Sammy were busily packing snow around the stump, Charlie Coyote trudged through the snow on the other side of the hill. "Brr! How I hate the winter," he muttered bitterly from between chattering teeth. "I can't keep a warm bone in my body. Firewood is hard to find, and food is so scarce that..."

Charlie stopped abruptly in his tracks and stared hungrily. "Are my frozen eyeballs playing tricks on me?" he said to himself hopefully, "or do I see Wuff and Sammy playing in the snow? If I lay my plan right, there will be prairie dog steak and squirrel chops in the icebox tonight!"

Wuff and Sammy, in the meantime, had almost completed their snow man.

"How does it look?" asked Sammy, stepping back to admire his handiwork.

"Well," replied Wuff, grinning at the white statue, "if we make it a little uglier, it'll look just like Charlie Coyote!"

"Look, Wuff!" Sammy cried. "There's Charlie now, on top of the hill. But what's that he's carrying?"

"It looks like a sled," Wuff answered, alarmed. "Whatever he's up to, it means trouble for us!"

Charlie, gripping the sled he had gotten to carry out his wicked plan, took a running start in the direction of Wuff and Sammy and then hurled himself upon it.

"Ha, ha!" he laughed menacingly as he sped down the hill. "There's no use running boys; there's no place to hide!"

"What are we going to do, Wuff?" Sammy asked seriously.

"Our only chance," Wuff shouted, "is to get behind the snow man. Hurry!"

Charlie aimed his sled directly for the snow man, whose outstretched arms were shielding the two trembling boys. The sled smashed through the snow covering, right into the hard wood underneath! There was a loud crunching sound as the sled splintered into a thousand pieces. "YEE-OW!" Charlie Coyote went spinning high into the air.

"Look, Wuff!" exclaimed Sammy. "Charlie landed head first in that snow bank, way over there!"

"Ha, ha," laughed Wuff as he watched Charlie struggle to free himself from his icy prison. "You know, Sammy," he explained knowingly, "Charlie's a mighty lucky fellow. It isn't often that a hothead like him gets such an opportunity to cool off!"
